This course presents anthropological perspectives on religion and ritual. In order to offer a course that can complement current offerings in Religion and Anthropology programs at Colorado College, we focus especially on two concerns that are distinctly anthropological:

- 1) Phenomena and concepts considered “nonWestern,” outside the “major” world religious traditions, or otherwise “exotic.”
- 2) Problem-based issues involving religious and spiritual practices, communities and functions.

These foci do not exclude taking the full scope of this subdiscipline into account; neither do they mean we concentrate exclusively on simple-technology, nonstate or pre-industrial societies. Many of the cases we study involve reinterpreted or syncretic practices resulting from encounters between distinct peoples; inevitably, all are affected by colonialism, religious missions and crusades, globalizing economies, environmental concerns, and other features of late modernism.

The theoretical currents examined in this course represent major veins in thought about religion in the 20th Century. We begin by considering ritual and religion in relation to other concepts, like science, culture, myth and symbol. We read diverse “classical” works (that is, old – for anthropology); such authors as Claude Levi-Strauss (structuralism), Mary Douglas (symbolic), Victor Turner (social drama) and Clifford Geertz (cultural performance) offer students diverse tools for ritual analysis.

This year, for the first time, we will undertake a substantive group research project while visiting religious communities in the Crestone area of the San Luis Valley. The project “Sacred Places, Religious Practices, and the Potential Impact of Natural Gas Drilling” takes as its points of focus:

- what locating a spiritual/religious practice in the San Luis Valley means for individual community members and the traditions or practices they observe;
- what the day-to-day aspects of practicing in different traditions in this place look like; and
- how the proposed exploration and potential exploitation of subsurface mineral resources would affect individuals, their practices, and their communities.

We follow our time at the Baca campus with a comparative study of shamanism in preparation for a visit by renowned ethnobotanist Wade Davis, followed by readings about witchcraft and sorcery, and concluding with an ethnography about “ritual magic” and accompanying epistemological leaps made by magicians and witches in contemporary England (Luhman)

To delve into peoples’ religious and ritual practices entails that careful thought be given to respectfulness.

Required Texts:

- Bowie, Fiona. 2006 (2nd edition). The Anthropology of Religion: An Introduction. Blackwell.
- Luhmann, T.M. 1989. Persuasions of the Witch’s Craft: Ritual Magic in Contemporary England. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Additional Readings:

Additional articles available on AN326 PROWL site.

Course Requirements:

Course format consists of short lectures, large and small group discussions, and student-led lecture and discussion.

Scrupulous attendance is assumed. For all classes and afternoon films, your presence and participation is integral; you may find yourself “performing” in a discussion on course readings on any day and should always arrive prepared and having thought about readings. Finally, this course is not designed to permit “passing” on a no-grade track without full-time commitment.

Assessment:

Participation (attendance, contribution to in-class activity)	25%
Short writing assignments and take-home essays	25%
Crestone interview and report section write-ups	25%
Comparative topical poster presentation (see separate sheet attached)	25%

Preparation for Class Participation: To help you enter class prepared, please come with notes and prepared to discuss:

- each reading (or chapter, in the books), and something to help you remember/think about it, i.e. a) summary of subject, b) argument, writing style, c) your own critical reading, thoughts, and so on.
- a list of key, unfamiliar and/or useful terms and concepts. We will occasionally discuss these in class.
- Your “daily question”: class will often involve structured go-arounds. Each day plan to have a discussion question you would be willing to put before the class, written in your notebook.

Odds and Ends:

- The course is shaped by the logic of the material. Some days that means you are responsible for over 100 pages of reading, while others reading is notably light. Some of the background work you should do, such as that for interviews, may not be assigned, but research you undertake on your own by reading texts on webpages or in reference works. Plan to read ahead on light nights.
