Gratitude Journaling and Your Health

Gratitude journals have become popular in recent years. This might be due, at least in part, to the wealth of research showing a beneficial link between journaling and health.

Researchers define gratitude journaling as “writing on a regular basis about things, people, and events one feels explicitly grateful for.” The format isn’t as important as the consistency of practice.

Here are just a few ways gratitude journaling¹ can support your wellbeing:

Increased Optimism
Increased optimism has been tied to journaling as well. Focusing on what you are grateful for helps you see the positive aspects of your life more clearly.

Reduced Inflammation
Another study² found a link between gratitude journaling and reduced biomarkers for stress and inflammation. This is important because inflammation has been tied to an increased risk for heart disease and other chronic conditions.

Reduced Aggression
Keeping a journal may also help reduce aggression related to hurt feelings. Some research suggests that gratitude journaling is protective against the kind of emotional distress that often leads to aggressive reactions.³

6 Ways to Express Gratitude

Gratitude is an expression of appreciation. It is an acknowledgment of kindness that can be an extremely powerful form of positive reinforcement.

It has been described as an emotion, a temporary feeling\(^5\), and a personality trait, but some believe it to be much more than that. Gratitude is one of the most effective tools for building successful teams and organizations. To cultivate a more collaborative culture in the workplace\(^6\), gratitude needs to play a central role.

Being grateful has also been associated\(^7\) with greater happiness and increased\(^8\) life satisfaction.

Here are some easy ways to express gratitude:

Say Thank You
Everyone likes to be acknowledged, and saying ‘thank you’ is one of the easiest ways to do so. This simple gesture can go a long way to building rapport and trust in relationships.

Write a Gratitude Letter
Thank you notes are another way to express gratitude. When you write a letter, be sure to include what the other person did to deserve your thanks.

Make a Gratitude Visit
If letter writing is not appropriate, consider making a face-to-face visit to express your gratitude in person.

Start a Gratitude Journal
The expression of gratitude does not always have to involve another person. Journaling offers a safe space for you to express your gratitude privately.

Give a Gift
Gift giving can also be a gesture of kindness. Similar to writing letters, whenever you give a gift, be sure to include a note explaining the reason behind it.

Do a Random Act of Kindness
If the source of your gratitude is not specific to a single person, you could opt to do a random act of kindness to brighten someone else’s day instead.

What is Toxic Positivity?

Most people understand the value of maintaining a positive mindset, but the belief that we should always be positive has many mental health experts raising red flags.

The term ‘toxic positivity’ refers to minimizing, denying, or invalidating negative feelings. Psychologists describe it as “the excessive and ineffective over-generalization of a happy, optimistic state across all situations.”

Unfortunately, positivity is not as effective as many believe. When we suppress or ignore negative feelings, they can intensify. That is why mental health experts often advise against adopting a “good vibes only” sentiment, which can be damaging to your relationships and to your wellbeing.

Here are a few tips to help you avoid toxic positivity.

Acknowledge All Emotions

Pretending everything is okay when life feels hard only prolongs negative emotions. When you allow all emotions to exist without judgment, you can process them more easily and focus your efforts on solutions.

Listen Without Fixing

Most of us have a natural tendency to want to help others, whether it be through advice giving or attempting to remedy the situation directly. The problem with this approach is that it communicates to the other person that you do not believe they are capable of solving the problem on their own. When someone you care about comes to you with a problem, focus on listening rather than fixing.

Ask Questions

Asking questions is a good way to demonstrate active listening. The next time a friend comes to you with a problem, try asking them this question: “What can I do that would be the most helpful for you right now?” Questions encourage honest dialogue and the open expression of emotions, even the negative ones.

Moving away from toxic positivity and toward a healthier form of positivity can make all the difference in your personal relationships and your health.
